cloning and partial sequence analysis of an antimicrobial peptide from a honey bee (Apis mellifera) larval midgut. We have isolated and characterized an antimicrobial peptide (AP) from an extract of the midgut lumen of the larval honey bee (Apis mellifera). An extract prepared from honey bee larval midguts was used to isolate and purify the peptide using anion-exchange chromatography and reverse-phase high-pressure liquid chromatography. A hybridization membrane bound the AP to a fragment of genomic DNA and indicated the AP to be a member of a large family of cationic peptides of approximately 22 amino acids.

urogenital incontinence in women using pelvic floor electromyography]. Pelvic floor muscle electromyography (EMG) is a new method for evaluating pelvic floor and urogenital incontinence in women. We assessed the pelvic floor and urogenital muscle activity with two different types of electrodiagnostic methods to determine the degree of damage. We examined 56 women, 30 (53.6%) had urinary incontinence, and 29 (40.1%) had pelvic floor dysfunction. Their mean age was 48.2 years. Nineteen (31.7%) were postmenopausal. In all women, dual EMG was performed for the determination of the results of two types of electrodiagnosis, Kegel electromyography (EMG) for the pelvic floor and Valsalva maneuvers (VM) for the urogenital muscles. All women were divided into groups according to the combined EMG findings of pelvic floor and urogenital muscles, as: pelvic floor only and urogenital only. The findings showed that the EMG results of VM and Kegel EMG were obtained for women with pelvic floor and urogenital muscle injuries. The women with pelvic floor injury and normal urogenital muscle function tended to have combined EMG findings of pelvic floor only, Valsalva only, or a combination of pelvic floor injury and urogenital muscle damage.

Furthermore, injury to the pelvic floor muscle could be estimated from the severity of the Valsalva EMG or a combination of pelvic floor injury and urogenital muscle damage. Dual EMG and the results of the EMG findings were useful for the detection of pelvic floor muscle injury and urogenital muscle injury and for the estimation of pelvic floor muscle injury according to severity of injury.
